To do that, I have found several tutorials on the net. However, I am confused about some points: What happens if the credentials used for authentication are wrong? If the username and password are wrong, does Java throw any exception? What happens when the credentials are correct but the userid is wrong? I know it is not trivial to answer, but could someone tell me how this works? A: A solution I have used in the past is to use UsernamePasswordAuthenticationToken, i.e., something like the following: UsernamePasswordAuthenticationToken authToken = new UsernamePasswordAuthenticationToken(username, password); SecurityContextHolder.getContext().setAuthentication(authToken); The getContext() method returns an Authentication object representing the authentication passed to it. If it's null, then the authentication failed. In addition, the userid is contained within the Authentication object, and you can retrieve it from the getPrincipal() method. So, if you then want to set the userid in a session, you can do the following: userId = authToken.getPrincipal(); HttpSession session = request.getSession(true); session.setAttribute("userid", userId.toString()); You can get and set the userid using it's toString() method in the Java code. This is because the attribute is stored as a String. It's time to dust off your pinstripes and make the jump from softball to baseball.
